

Integrating a Constitution with its Bylaws and Continuing Resolutions

Some find the distinctions between their congregation's constitutions, bylaws, and continuing resolutions to be confusing. Robert's notes that a constitution should specify the name, purpose, members, officers and their election, meetings, and how the constitution might be amended. He describes bylaws as "all the rules that are of such importance that they cannot be changed in any way without previous notice, except those placed in the constitution and rules of order. The bylaws should always provide for their amendment and also for a quorum" (p.7).

Robert envisioned standing or continuing resolutions as agreements among members that would guide their work together and thus could be easily adopted or rejected. Ms. Helgen ("Coffee, Cabs, and Constitutions") notes recalls that since the ELCA Model Constitution allows continuing resolutions to be amended (adopted, changed, or dissolved) by either during a congregational meeting or by the church council, they might be used for "ongoing matters, especially those it wants the council to attend to and perhaps modify. A congregation might also use a continuing resolution (rather than a simple motion) as a way to take action on matters that have an ongoing effect...and that future councils should be aware of" (p.4).

To help illustrate ways to use these three elements, constitution, bylaws, and continuing resolutions, consider the following example of a congregation which included the provision for a cemetery board, its membership, and its purpose in the church constitution along with the board's primary responsibilities and ongoing tasks. Since the congregation meets once a year, any change related to the role and operation of their cemetery board would require motions approved at each of two annual meetings.

The following chart offers one way to move this congregational cemetery board's purposes, procedures, and continuing tasks into a format that could be more easily modified should the opportunity, or necessity, to do so arise. Note that while amendments to the constitution require two annual meetings, bylaws could be changed during a single congregational meeting with approval of a majority of those voting. Continuing resolutions can be changed with approval of a majority of those voting during a congregational meeting or by the approval of two-thirds of the voting members of the church council during one of its meetings.

While the following division of the constitutional passage concerning the cemetery board is hypothetical and thus might be done differently by others, it generally reflects a the need to move the more fluid facets of the board's role into bylaws or resolutions so that they could be more easily changed to respond to changing conditions.
